People should have the ability and liberty to dream no matter how gloomy the present. However, just dreaming alone is not enough, there must be a plan to make the dream a reality. It is important to take small but sure steps towards one's goals and not lose faith if there are setbacks on the way. India has deep roots and a rich philosophical legacy which it must leverage on its way ahead. Being connected to one's roots gives a nation a sense of identity and the confidence to surge ahead.

The last 25 years were all about performance and achievement. We have become a performance centric society. There has to be a shift in focus from performance to Sanskar or values. The latter is more important for the overall growth of an individual and the nation. Sanskar have to take precedence over all other issues and it has to have the ripple down effect from parents, teachers and leaders from all walks of life.

Good leadership will be key to helping India reach its potential by 2047. We need good leaders in every area from civil society to business. Leadership is not always about leading it is also about serving the larger good.

Leaders will need to enlarge the circle of trust and develop a bond with all those that fall within it. The country has an important asset in its youth, it must leverage it well to build a cadre of new age leaders.
